Performance No external hardware is used in the computer emulation, except for the audio card. This is a heavy process, as the game is running fast and uses real-time 3D. This is because to draw the 3D graphics on the display screen, the CPU must be used, and because the game expects the sound card to play music. A CPU emulation strategy can be found on the PC-Games .

"Some critics believe the game is difficult. The game's difficulty is similar to other racing games like Micro Machines 2, which was one of the inspirations for the game. The game's difficulty is similar to that of the original Need for Speed from EA."

Reception The PC version of Need for Speed Porsche Unleashed was the fastest-selling game of 2000. PC Zone, after reviewing the PC version of the game, wrote: "Need for Speed Porsche Unleashed succeeds in staying true to the core values of the series. It's a great game - but a hard one." The Console/PC version of the game received "The thumbs up from many reviewers, with some calling the game the best Porsche based racing game ever made. The game would eventually be recognized as a cult classic with multiple editions being made in the future." According to Eurogamer, "Need for Speed: Porsche Unleashed reached an important milestone, thanks to the uncanny accuracy of its PC version: it was the fastest-selling PC game of 2000." PC Zone, after reviewing the PC version of the game, wrote: "The first-person view is alright, but the engine's simple controls and lack of features, along with the AI, are just terrible. Porsche Unleashed could have been the one to finally bring out the worst of EA: the notoriously bad AI and terrible replays, the little improvements that were developed for Need for Speed: Underground".

A Bekaa Valley surgeon who is refusing to refer Syrian refugees to a second hospital said Monday that "God forbid" he would treat a vulnerable group because of the deadly threat of the virus. Dr. Emad Shamasna, 57, of the town of El-Mahalla in the Bekaa Valley, is refusing to refer patients because of his concerns about the threat posed by the virus and the lack of medical equipment to fight it, he told the Bethlehem-based Ma'an News Agency. "It's up to me as a doctor to continue working or not," Shamasna, a surgeon at El-Lous Clinic in El-Mahalla, said. "God forbid I would treat a group at risk because of the virus. I only treat people who are well, and go back home." Shamasna, an OB-GYN, performed some early surgeries in 2014 in one of the hospitals in Syria's most militant city, Aleppo. From there he moved to Lebanon to take advantage of its lower cost health care system. Shamasna said he was stopped in the Bekaa Valley last week by the Israeli military who said a permit was not necessary to enter the area. Shamasna said he was not concerned because he has been working in El-Mahalla for many years. "The problem is that there is a lack of physicians, so you need the government's approval to work, that's the only problem," he said. Shamasna said he was not aware of the suspected cases of the new coronavirus that have emerged in the region.
